

This is in response to the possibility that the No-Call Law may be lowered. This past couple of months have been so peaceful. Our phone does not ring 20 or 30 times a day with telemarketers on the other end. My husband can sleep since he works third shift, our evenings are peaceful with out worrying that some intrusive stranger is going to tell us how desparately we need their product. In other words we are no longer afraid to answer our phone. As for telemarketers calling that consider us "existing customers", if we wanted to existing customers we would still be with them. Am I wrong? I sincerely hope that the laws are not lowered. I would hate to think that we would have to become very rude to some very nice people again.